SOUTH AFRICAN COURT'S TREATMENT OF FRAZER SOLAR CASE 'TROUBLING'

Introduction

Frazer Solar GmbH (FSG) wishes to draw attention to the article written by Vincent Manko director of South African law firm Cliffe Dekker Hofmeyer (CDH) in the October 2022 edition of their bulletin International Dispute Resolution in Africa titled 'A Disjointed Approach to the Enforcement of Arbitral Awards.' This article discusses the FSG case and in particular the May 2022 South African court ruling to indefinitely postpone the Government of Lesotho's rescission application of the arbitration award.

Mr Manko and CDH are not involved in the case, so their views are objective and impartial, and as such are beneficial for those wishing to understand the intricacies of the matter in more detail.

Brief Background

In January 2020, an independent arbitrator ruled in FSG's favour concerning a series of contractual breaches committed by the Kingdom of Lesotho, related to a renewable energy project developed by the company. Lesotho was ordered to pay Frazer Solar €50 million in damages but failed to do so.

Consequently, in May 2021, Frazer Solar's lawyers commenced a worldwide enforcement action against assets held by the Kingdom including payments relating to the sale of water from Lesotho to South Africa.

Lesotho launched a three-prong response to the asset seizures being: a review application to the Lesotho High Court to have the original supply agreement set aside; a rescission application to the South African High Court to rescind the court order to allow the asset seizures and set aside the arbitral award; and an application to the south African High Court to stay the asset seizures until the Lesotho review and South African rescission applications had been determined.

The three applications were due to be heard on 22 May 2022. However, just prior to the hearing Lesotho sought an indefinite postponement of the South African proceedings pending determination of the Lesotho review application. In simple terms; Lesotho argued that if the agreement was nullified, then there would be no arbitration clause and therefore no arbitration award and therefore no basis on which FSG could seize Lesotho's assets; therefore the South African court should wait until the Lesotho court made a ruling on the issue. FSG argued that a country is bound by its own laws and is not subservient to other countries. Therefore, South Africa should not defer to Lesotho on a matter related to South African law. The Court ruled in Lesotho's favour and the South African proceedings were postponed.

'Troubling' Decision

Mr Manko explains that the Court based its decision on two findings: if the supply agreement was nullified it would nullify everything; and that giving the Lesotho court the opportunity to review the agreement would be in the interests of South African public policy. Importantly, Mr Manko correctly points out that the Court cited no authorities for either of these findings. He states that the decision is 'troubling' and could 'potentially undermine South Africa's efforts to establish itself as a regional hub for international arbitration.'

Mr Manko identifies four 'troubling' issues with the decision:

1. It is 'worrisome' that a South African court would not consider international law, to which South Africa is bound.
2. Even 'more troubling' is that a South African court would not consider South African law. He states 'the South African court could not permissibly defer its determination to the Lesotho courts.'
3. Even if the Lesotho court does set aside the arbitration award, at best, it is just a single factor to consider and is not decisive in itself.
4. 'More importantly' the International Arbitration Act, the New York Convention and the Model Law were relevant but not considered.

Mr Manko concludes by stating the decision will 'most likely be overturned' in future.

Frazer Solar Comments

A spokesperson for FSG said "We agree completely with Mr Manko that the South African court's decision was indeed 'troubling' and did not adequately consider South Africa's obligations under its own and international laws."

The postponed proceedings have been rescheduled for the week commencing 5 June 2023.

A disjointed approach to the enforcement of arbitral awards

There is little doubt that the promulgation of the International Arbitration Act 15 of 2017 that incorporated the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law (UNCITRAL) Model Law into the national law, was meant to improve South Africa's lure as an international commercial arbitration hub. The duty of our courts to support international arbitration and to give effect, where they can, to international arbitration agreements is therefore similarly unquestionable.

This context is necessary when considering the recent judgment of the High Court of South Africa, Gauteng Division, Johannesburg in Kingdom of Lesotho and Another v Fraser Solar GMBH and Others (33700/20) ZAGPJHC (9 May 2022). The dispute in Fraser Solar had its genesis in a supply agreement purportedly concluded between Fraser Solar and the Kingdom of Lesotho on 24 September 2018. The supply agreement was signed by a former Minister in the Office of the Prime Minister of the Kingdom of Lesotho at the time. The kingdom contended that the cabinet member, in purporting to act on behalf of the kingdom, had no authority to conclude the supply agreement or bind the kingdom to its terms. It further contended that despite purporting to oblige the kingdom to incur massive debt in order to purchase renewable energy products from Fraser Solar, the supply agreement was signed without any attempt to conduct a lawful procurement process, as required by the laws of the kingdom.

In the supply agreement, the parties chose arbitration as a mode of settling their disputes. They further nominated South African law as the law of arbitration to determine any disputes, chose Johannesburg as the seat of the arbitration, and agreed that arbitration would be conducted in terms of the rules of arbitration in force of the South African Association of Arbitrators.

Upon breach, Fraser Solar referred the matter to arbitration and obtained an arbitral award against the kingdom for an amount of €50 million, including interests and costs. The award was made an order of court by the High Court of South Africa, Gauteng Division, Johannesburg at the instance of Fraser Solar.

Both the award and the order were granted in the absence of the kingdom. Fraser Solar then took steps to attach the kingdom's assets in South Africa and Mauritius.

THE KINGDOM'S APPLICATIONS

Subsequent to the award being made an order of court, the kingdom brought three substantive applications, namely:

- an application in the Lesotho High Court to review, set aside and declare as void the supply agreement and the arbitration agreement embedded in the supply agreement;
- an application in the High Court of South Africa to rescind the court order that made the arbitral award an order of court and to review and set aside the arbitral award; and

- an application in the High Court of South Africa to stay the execution of notices of attachment and writs of executions arising from the award being made an order of court pending the outcome of the review application and the rescission application.

The Trans-Caledon Tunnel Authority also brought an application before the High Court of South Africa to challenge the writ of execution and notices of attachment issued in respect of its bank accounts.

POSTPONEMENT

The applications were consolidated and were due to be heard in the week of 16 May 2022. On the eve of the hearing, the kingdom sought a postponement of the rescission application indefinitely pending the review application in the Lesotho High Court. The kingdom contended that the rescission application should be postponed indefinitely to enable the review application in Lesotho to be finalised. The review application in Lesotho was to challenge the lawfulness and constitutionality of the decision to enter into the supply agreement, including the embedded arbitration clause.

Fraser Solar opposed the application on the basis that the South African court could not be asked to defer its determination to another country's courts and that the South African court was under an obligation imposed by national and international law to itself determine whether a ground existed for non-recognition or non-enforcement of the arbitral award.

VALIDITY OF THE SUPPLY AGREEMENT

In granting the indefinite postponement, the court in Fraser Solar found that it was "pragmatic" to let the review application in the Lesotho High Court (which the court said had prospects of success) proceed to determine the validity of the supply agreement and only thereafter would the validity of the subsequent act be determined in the rescission application. This was because the court was of the view that if the supply agreement was a nullity from the outset, every subsequent act which depended on the validity of the supply agreement would also be invalid. The court cited no authority for this finding.

The court in Fraser Solar was also of the view that if the rescission application was decided before the review application in the Lesotho High Court, the South African court determining the rescission application would be deprived of the benefit of the Lesotho High Court's first instance determination of the validity of the supply agreement. This would mean that the South African court in the rescission application would be at a serious risk of giving effect to an arbitral award and default judgment which could subsequently be based upon unlawful and invalid breaches of the kingdom's procurement laws and Constitution. The court found that this would constitute significant prejudice to the broader public interest and administration of justice. The court cited no authority for these propositions either.

A TROUBLING APPROACH

The court's approach in Fraser Solar is troubling in many respects. First, it is worrisome that a South African court would render judgment regarding an international arbitration agreement and subsequent arbitral award without reference to the International Arbitration Act, the New York Convention and the Model Law, which has been incorporated into South African municipal law by the International Arbitration Act. The court simply did not engage with international law on the topic.

Second and perhaps even more troublingly, it is for a South African court to determine whether a ground for recourse against an arbitral award is established; not the courts of Lesotho. The New York Convention, the Modal Law and the International Arbitration Act are all clear on this score. The South African court could not permissibly defer its determination to the Lesotho courts.

Third, the court in Fraser Solar relied on Trustees for the time being of the Burmilla Trust and Another v President of the RSA and Another (64/2021) [2022] ZASCA 22; [2022] 2 All SA 412 (SCA) (1 March 2022) for the proposition that it was for the domestic courts to exercise jurisdiction to hear and determine the validity of decisions and international tribunals must “give appropriate weight to the determination by the domestic courts of such issues” and that “exercise restraint when evaluating decisions of municipal courts despite not being bound by those decisions”. Putting aside the fact that the thrust of that proposition came from the minority judgment, it is important to keep in mind that in international law, states bear responsibility for unlawful acts of state organs, even if accomplished outside the limits of their competence and contrary to domestic law¹. So the fact that the High Court in Lesotho may ultimately review and set aside the supply agreement as null and void, is but one of the many factors that the arbitral tribunal would consider. It is not decisive.

Perhaps even more importantly, the court in Fraser Solar was not sitting as an international tribunal. It was rather sitting to consider a postponement of the rescission application of the court order that made the arbitral award an order of court and the application to review and set aside the arbitral award. The International Arbitration Act, the New York Convention and the Model Law were therefore aptly applicable.

While the pronouncement in Fraser Solar will probably have no precedent-setting effect and will most likely be overturned in future matters, such findings can potentially undermine South Africa’s efforts in establishing itself as a regional “go-to” hub for international commercial arbitration.
